① The V-bottom hull appeared in the latter half of the 1800's. In 1877 Forest and Stream published a detailed description of a shipjack to help amateur builders. The boat originated somewhere on Long Island. The construction resembles that used today in small yachts.

Originally the term "shipjack" referred to the rig-name <sup>regardless of the hull</sup>. The shipjack as we know it today was called "two-sail bateau."

The bateaus are very seaworthy and withstand the steep and dangerous seas met with on the Chesapeake during the stormy "dredging" season. The shipjacks prevail because of Md law which permits dredging only by boats which

This law was intended to prevent depletion of the oyster beds and to keep the revenues in the hands of small independent operators.

the oyster sound. Now the men can work - closer to home - and the home terminal times a week or every night depending on where they are dredging.

The ship takes an oyster to ~~Patten~~<sup>Patented</sup> Tong in the winter others have no rigs but shaft long <sup>or systems</sup> These boats are used for crabbing, eeling or fishing parties during the other ~~the~~ months of the year.

In old days they would load lumber & water melons etc in off season & seed oysters.

APPENDIX V

Roster of Bugeyes

The following list is composed of all the vessels definitely known to be bugeyes. The measurements, dates, places of construction, and official numbers have been taken from the various editions of The List of Merchant Vessels of the United States. The names of builders have come from many sources, such as builders' certificates where available, from the builders themselves and from their descendants.

As stated in the text, it is known that the Roster is not complete. Anyone who can add to, correct, or amend the list, or who knows of half models, sail plans or photographs of bugeyes is invited to write the author. With such assistance it may be possible to extend greatly our knowledge of the type and its builders.

Symbols following the names of the builders give the variations from the typical sharp-sterned, two-masted leg-of-mutton rigged bugeye. These are:

*Round stern. %Square stern. †Square rig. ‡One mast.

HARVESTING WINTER'S GOLD, skipjacks pull their dredges across the oyster beds of the Chesapeake Bay. At the turn of the century, 1,500 of these handcrafted, sail-driven workboats plied the bay. Although only 30 remain in the last commercial sailing fleet in North America, new skipjacks are once again joining the fleet to follow the watermen's traditional manner of oystering.

NEW SKIPJACKS READIED

TO TAKE ON THE OYSTERS

WASHINGTON -- The skipjack will sail into the mists of memory, they said. They'll never build another one.

Observers of the Chesapeake Bay and its oystering industry have predicted that the use of sail for commercial fishing, long confined to the historic skipjack fleet in the Maryland portion of the Bay, will not survive these modern times. But the epitaph may be premature.

Since the turn of the century, when 1,500 skipjacks worked the Bay, a few of these sturdy craft have run up the rivers to die each year or have been converted into pleasure boats. In a turnabout this season and last, two former skipjacks that had been sold as yachts in the 1960s have been reclaimed by the fleet and returned to their original function--oystering.

And a new skipjack, the Dee of St. Mary's, recently was launched--the first newly constructed vessel to join the fleet in 24 years. A second will be launched later in the oyster dredging season, which runs from Nov. 1 to March 15.

"Leg-o'-Mutton" Mainsail

The skipjack is a shallow-draft, V-bottomed, centerboard workboat--broad-beamed with a long needle bow and square stern. Essentially a work platform built close to the water for dredging ease, its good looks are due to its graceful bowsprit, huge triangular "leg-o'-mutton" mainsail, and small working jib sail.

SKIPJACKS (PAGE TWO)

The skipjack came into being sometime after the Civil War, initially as an inexpensive adaptation of the more graceful bugeyes and schooners. Based on the philosophy that form follows function, the skipjack evolved as the best solution for oyster dredging, easy to build as well as handle.

This functional quality, and an 1865 Maryland law that restricts the dredging of oysters to sailing vessels, has ensured the survival of the 30 remaining skipjacks registered to work the Bay this year.

Now two new skipjacks are being constructed by shipwright Melbourne Smith, modeled on the Minnie V, which was built by a waterman in 1906. The first, to be named the Minnie V, will be docked at Baltimore's recently renovated Inner Harbor as a museum. The second will join the oyster dredging fleet this winter.

Handcrafted Boats

The Dee of St. Mary's was built for Skipper Jack Russell by Francis Goddard in the watermen's tradition of excellent handcrafted boats made from the timber of the forests near the banks of the Bay's many tributaries. Goddard would like to build two more--one for his 25-year-old son, Wayne, and one for himself.

Although it costs nearly $100,000 to construct a new skipjack and between $6,000 and $20,000 annually to maintain the older ones, public programs may help the oystermen stay in business. These include loan guarantees that permit new skipjacks to be financed over 15 to 20 years, and deferred tax liability on money saved for replacing and improving commercial vessels.

The watermen are optimistic about the future of the fleet. Stanley Larrimore, an Eastern Shore waterman who captains the Lady Katie, predicts: "There'll be skipjacks working as long as Maryland prohibits 'drudgin' under power and as long as there are 'arsters' in the Bay."

CHESAPEAKE BAY OYSTERMEN

KEEP SAILING LEGACY AFLOAT

By Rebecca R. Kirtland

CHESAPEAKE BEACH, Md. -- We set sail in the early dawn aboard the newest skipjack in the last commercial sailing fleet in North America--the first built in 24 years.

It is inaugural week for the Dee of St. Mary's, a 56-foot, V-bottomed sloop. She is the first skipjack--the traditional workboat of the oyster dredger--to be constructed on Maryland's western shore of the Chesapeake Bay.

The six-man crew has completed its pre-dawn work, which starts around 4 a.m., readying the boat for a day of oyster dredging--"drudgin for arsters." The crew calls this graceful craft a "drudge boat," which doesn't describe the way the vessel with its tall single mast, huge mainsail, small jib sail and long needle bow hugs the water and skims lightly over the Bay.

"Rack of Eye"

Francis Goddard, 48, of Piney Point, Md., built the Dee by "rack of eye," or without written plans, in the fine old tradition of skipjack builders. He followed the formula watermen have handed down through generations: The boom is the length of the boat, the mast is the length of the boat plus the beam, and the bowsprit is the length of the beam.

While still in port, the Dee's cabin provides an island of warmth and light in the cold, clear darkness. The cook is preparing hotcakes, slab bacon, fried eggs, and coffee--lots of coffee.

OYSTERING (PAGE TWO)

A diesel-powered yawl pushes the skipjack out of the harbor as dawn breaks. By the time we reach "Old Rock," the oyster bed we'll dredge, the sun is up. Dredging can be done only from sunup to sundown, and on most days it takes that long to make the 150-bushel limit.

Before dredging can begin, the yawl is hoisted to ride behind the stern; the skipjack must depend entirely on the wind. Maryland conservation measures permit only sail-driven vessels to dredge the deep water for oysters, although watermen may use the yawl for dredging on two "pushdays" per week--each Monday and Tuesday.

The work begins immediately. Captain Clyde Evans, a venerated 70-year-old waterman from the Eastern Shore with 53 years of following the water, handles the wheel and serves as the resident adviser. Skipper Jack Russell, 37, owner of the Dee, is a new breed of waterman. The owner of an oyster shucking house, a member of Maryland's Tidal Fisheries Advisory Commission, and a college graduate, Russell, nonetheless, calls Captain Clyde the "sage."

Water in the Blood

Captain Clyde sold his own skipjack after the 1978-79 oyster dredging season with the intention of retiring, but Russell persuaded him to spend another winter on the water helping him get his start. And as Captain Clyde said: "When you've followed the water all your life and you've got it in your blood, it's hard to give it up."

Captain Clyde gives the signal and the hydraulic dredges are lowered. Two men work one dredge on each side of the boat. The skipjack pulls the dredges across the oyster rock and Captain Clyde can tell by the wind and the pull of the dredges when it's time to bring them up. He yells "ho" and the dredges are hoisted.

OYSTERING (PAGE THREE)

Made of rope and chain with teeth for scraping the bottom, each dredge is lifted by two men, and its treasure dumped on deck. If the wind is strong, the dredges immediately are dropped back in the water.

The men quickly cull the oysters from the shells and other debris. Some of them like to sit on their haunches for this work, others kneel, and some stand bent over from the waist and throw the oysters behind them as if they are centering a football. They say it depends on where you want it to "git you"--in the back or in the knees.

When Captain Clyde finds an area he wants to work, Russell puts down buoys at each end of the run to provide a general guide to the good "licks."

Water Ballet

However, this morning we see two skipjacks from the Eastern Shore sailing over to the western side to work "Old Rock." Apparently they've heard the Dee is doing well there. Not wanting to share the bounty with competitors, Captain Clyde moves off a bit, finding the licks not so good. The other two skipjacks take positions nearby and work the same area--moving back and forth--performing the centuries-old water ballet of workboats under sail.

After hearing a comment on the sparseness of the licks, crew member Francis Cullison, a 31-year-old waterman from St. George's Island on the western shore who has been oystering since he was 12 years old, says: "Captain Clyde'll find us some arsters soon as them drudge boats leave."

And he's right. After a couple of hours, the other skipjacks go back to the Eastern Shore where they know the oyster rocks, and the Dee's licks improve.

OYSTERING (PAGE FOUR)

By 9:30 a.m., Russell has shucked "a mess of arsters" and crew member John Wright has whipped up a big batch of oyster stew and a pot of bean soup. When it seems by midmorning that we have the whole Bay to ourselves and a good oyster rock below, the water goes "dish ca'm"--calm as a dish. "Ain't neither breath," Cullison says and that means the sails won't move the dredges.

The one dredge in the water is enough to anchor the boat. It is quiet and beautiful on the Bay, but time's-a-wasting and they may have to push the skipjack back to the harbor with another day lost to the weather. "Don't bother me none," crew member Bob Walker, 47, says. "Everything out here depends on the weather and you gotta accept that."

"Right Smart of Arsters"

Around noon a breeze begins to stir--enough to work one dredge at a time--and a little later a good wind blows for sailing. The dredges go down and come up full. "Right good lick," Russell says. "Right smart of arsters. Right smart of shells, too," he laughs.

They work without stopping until 5 p.m. when it's time to head back to shore. We sail home on a stiff breeze, take down the sails and push the skipjack into harbor with the yawl. Twelve hours, six men, and a "mighty fine rig" have brought in 80 bushels of the fattest oysters in the Bay:

"I don't have to make lots of money for this to be satisfying," Russell says. "It's a good life--an independent life. It's my life, that's all."
